The ruins of the castle, round which a moat can still be traced, mark the spot where the contest took place. The result is easily anticipated. Captain Bolton was successful, and his descendants, up to a few years since, continued to enjoy the fruits of the conquest.ⁱ The citizens of Waterford were so affrighted at the loss of Passage, that they told the Commissioners of Trust they would surrender the city unless aid was sent to them immediately. In reply to their demand, Ormonde declared that his army could no longer be kept together for want of supplies; if these were procured, he would march without delay to their relief. But he found it impossible to procure them. ⁱ Rylands Hist. of Waterford, p. 71. He set out and marched all night along the northern bank of the Suir, conducting Brian O'Neill's horse and some foot to, reinforce the garrison. Early the next day he encamped on a hill opposite the town. On arriving before the city, Cromwell had sent a trumpeter to summon the garrison to yield upon quarter. Ferrall would give way to none to answer other than himself; he requested the trumpeter to return to his master with this result, that he was Lieutenant-General Ferrall, governor of that place, at present having 2,000 of his Ulster force there; that as long as any of them did survive, he would not yield the town. ¹ The sudden appearance of the reinforcements made Cromwell change his plans. Having failed to corrupt the Governor, and being disheartened at the prospect of a tedious siege in midwinter, he thought his wisest course was to retire from before the place, and to seek winter-quarters elsewhere. He had alre...
