

Address (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Address
Mr. President and Fellow-Citizens: On the fourth day of July, one hundred years ago, thirteen sparsely populated colonies, acting through their representatives in general Congress assembled, and publishing to the world a statement of the causes that impelled the separation, absolved their allegiance to the British Crown, and declared themselves free and independent states. In commemoration of that event, the most important in the history of civil government, forty millions of people, embraced within the domain of the United States of America, join to-day in national jubilee. At the dividing line between the century that has chronicled the birth, the trials and the greatness of the Republic, and the one now opening bright with promise, a review of the past shall be alike the source of pleasurable emotions and of beneficial lessons for guidance in the future. The system of government which our forefathers established was not the result of foolhardy experiment. Men of intelligence and reflection are not apt to pledge their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor merely from caprice or in a spasm of temerity. They calculated the operation of moral forces, from data supposed to be trustworthy, with the same precision with which the astronomer predicts an eclipse. About the Publisher
