Not illustrated. 1858 Excerpt: ...into tears, and exclaimed:--Alas! alas! the house is desolate; this is not as it used to be; hut, oh God, thou art just and holy: it has pleased thee in thy infinite wisdom to take the child and leave the mother; and hard though it be to part, yet will I ever pray. God, thou art the master, thy holy will be done, and thy hallowed name be praised and blessed to all eternity. She then visited the chapel, where the hearts of her beloved husband and child were enshrined, proved for the eternal repose of their souls, and returned to her apartments choked with sorrow, and blinded with grief. Before the fallen Queen had recovered from this shock, she was forced to submit to the estrangement of her beloved son. By order of the French ministers, the Chevalier de St. George quitted St. Germain on the eighteenth of August, and proceeded to Livry, where he was permitted to take up his residence, previous to his final departure from France. From Livry he paid several visits to his mother at Chaillot, and he visited the opera at Paris on the same night that Lord Bolingbroke, the English ambassador extraordinary for the present, went there in state. On the first of September, Maria, and the nobles and ladies who shared her exile, paid a formal visit to her son at Livry. The next day, the mother and son parted in sorrow, and after three days journey, the Pretender reached Chalons-sur-Marne, where he was to await the events of the negotiations at Utrecht. Throughout the autumn the Queen suffered from ill health, and from a melancholy depression of spirits, occasioned by her domestic misfortunes. In December, her sorrows were increased by the news of her son's coolness to the Earl of Middleton, his chief eounsellor. Middleton had been charged with hetraying the ...
