Excerpt: ...and monopolies, thus creating antagonism and hostility; whereas, obviously, it is the regime distinguished by the spirit of Free Trade and co-operation, tending towards development of relations and of association, bringing in its train goodwill and unity, which conforms to the general interests of peoples as well as to natures justice, morality, and Will. Beneficent Nature refuses to recognize obstacles which men oppose to co-operation between themselves. For this reason, while these obstacles remain, no more in peace-time than in war-time can intercourse between the states be carried on by means other than those which being anti-natural are violent and immoral. These debased methods must be as artful as their results will be artificial. With deceit under the name of diplomatic skill, secrecy becomes the essential condition of their ephemeral successes. Such are the ways and morals of most statesmen and great politicians in their com the autonomous colonies of the British Dominion would intervene as separate states.) Those in whose hands are the destinies of their contemporaries--and of numerous generations to follow--must not lose sight of the fact that short of complete destruction of one of the two actual belligerent parties (signifying exhaustion of the other, and the probable downfall of Europe) there are but three possible solutions by way of arrangement: 1. Territorial acquisitions. 2. Payment of war indemnities. 3. Economic concessions. It being undeniable that territorial acquisitions and payments of indemnities are and will remain unthinkable except as results of total defeat, there eventually remains no arrangement possible other than that of economic concessions. This third solution of...
