These he requested to know as a matter of right. Undoubtedly the Executive had the power to censure and recall a public minister; but that power ought always to be exercised according to the strict rules of justice. For twelve days he waited impatiently for a response, then wrote again, f To this note an answer came. The request, Pickering replied, was unexpected. Save of the justices of the Supreme Court, the tenure of all Government offices was at the will of the President alone. This was constitutional. It was clearly not intended that the expediency of particular acts of the Presidents will should be submitted to trial by discussion in the public prints. % Monroe replied. He expressed astonishment at the doctrines the Secretary announced, wrote much about the blessings of an honest fame, and declared he never would suffer himself to be robbed of it by any description of persons under any pretence whatever. Do you suppose, were Lis words, that the power given to the Executive to censure and remove public ministers allows him to do so without proper cause? Do you suppose that the Executive is not accountable to the party injured and to the people of the United States? Such doctrine is against the Constitution. It becomes the meridian of a country where a monarch inherits the land, and the people who dwell on it are his slaves. The administration had injured him. The situation of the United States was critical. An idea was abroad that the crisis was in some way due to him. He then asked for a room and the aid of a clerk for a few days to revise his letters to the Department of State. Mr. Pickering assured him that yiel...
