Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: ... or touching the public interest in relation to the forests, seems to have been proclaimed by the blowing of a horn. By the charter of Henry III. any great man, such as an Archbishop, Earl, or Baron, going to the king by his command, and passing through a forest, should be at liberty to kill one or two of the kings deer by the view of the forester, but if the forester was not present he should blow a horn so that he seem not to steal, and so likewise on returning. It was not the licensed foresters and watchers only who were horn-blowers, but pilgrims and travellers in the wilder parts of the country also carried these useful instruments, which they sounded when they had lost their way or were in any danger. A certain kind of horn or trumpet was also blown in early times every evening in some upland districts to call the cattle home out of reach of the wolves. The use of dogs was substituted in later times for this method. But in some of the mountainous districts on the Continent it is still kept up, and at the peculiar dull, loud blast the conscious cattle raise their heads and then slowly make their way to their accustomed folds. Visitors to the remoter parts of Norway may have noticed a peculiar kind of wooden trumpet, called a hire, which is often as much as five feet long, slung across the shoulders of native travellers who are strange to the district they are going through. When any danger arises, or they have lost their way, they blow the lure, and the signal, if not too violently interrupted by echoes, can be heard, and the direction whence it proceeds found out at a considerable distance. Formerly at Cam Houses, in the Forest of Langstrothdale, a gun was fired as a signal to belated travellers, this being perhaps a more effective method...
