Excerpt: ... gold, my silver and my treasure will last, which I have brought with me from Spain, but which is not so great by thirty times as what I have left behind, I am willing it should be divided among your people. Upon which the prince said; My lord, you speak well: and for the surplus of the debt, I will take that upon myself towards them, and will order whatever sums you may want to be advanced you as a loan, until we shall be arrived in Castille. 4 By my head, replied don Pedro, you will do me a great kindness. Several of the moll experienced among them, such as the earl of Armagnac, the lord de Pommiers, sir John Chandos, the captal de Buch, and some others, having considered the business, said, the prince of Wales could not well undertake this expedition without having gained the consent and good will of the king of Navarre; for he could not enter Spain without traversing his kingdom, and by the pass of Roncevaux. This entrance to Spaiti they were not quite sure of obtaining; for the king of Navarre had lately formed fresh alliances with the ballard Henry. It was therefore debated for a long time, in what manner they could succeed in gaining this important point. The wisest were of opinion, that another meeting should be appointed, and that it should be held in the city of Bayonne; and that the prince, when there, should send able ambassadors Roncevaux,--a village in Navarre, made famous by the defeat of Charlemagne, in which Orlando and Rinaldo, so much celebrated by the Id romances, were slain.. to to the king of Navarre, to entreat be would come to this conference at Bayonne. This resolution was adopted; and the conference broke up. They had all a wiith to attend the meeting at Bayonne; and a day was fixed for holding it During this interva...
