Not illustrated.1829 Excerpt: ... Book lamentation. As the power of speech returned,, IIII, she modestly declared her insufficiency for so grand a station. This was not listened to; nor did she doubt or deliberate farther; unfortunately, her judgment, if not dazzled by the splendid prize, was at least overborne by the presence and homage of the most powerful and distinguished men of the kingdom acknowledging her to be their queen. Pausing only to offer before them a prayer to her Maker for his assistance, she yielded to their wishes, and unresistingly took the sceptre which they placed within her hands.40 Such is her own account of this eventful moment, of their solicitation, and of her decisionShe does not intimate that she refused the tempting diadem, yor recollected the prior claims of the excluded princesses. Her unaffected diffidence doubted her own qualifications; but no moral perception of the injustice of accepting anothers right, to the prejudice of the injured, appears to have impressed her. The crown was offered--she was urged--she was astonished--and she consented. The next day, she was taken in great state down the Thames, with a splendid company of nobility, of both sexes, to the Tower.41 Her mother, as the lady of the highest rank there, held her train as she As soon as I had, with infinite pain to my mind, understood these things, how much I remained beside myself, stunned and agitated, I leave to those lords to testify, who saw me fall to the ground, overwhelmed with sudden and unexpected dismay, and who knew how grievously I wept. Lett. ib. 357. I turned to God, and humbly petitioned and supplicated him, that if what had been given to me were rightly and lawfully mine, he would grant me so much grace and spirit that I might govern these kingdoms to his glory and serv...
