Not illustrated. 1865 Excerpt: ... that Gardiner had a mind to make it pass for their own contrivance; but Fox, who was of a more ingenuous nature, told Approved the king from whom they had it. Ho was much affected with k1ng f it, so soon as he heard it, and said, had he known it sooner, it would have saved him a vast expense, and much trouble; and would needs have Cranmer sent for to courl, saying, in his Fuller, v. coarse way of speaking, That he had the sow by the right ear. p. X79J go he was sent for jo court5 an(J being brought before the king, he carried himself so, that the king conceived an high opinion of his judgment and candour, which he preserved to his death, and still paid a respect to him, beyond all the other churchmen that were about him: and though he made more use of Gardiner in his business, whom he found a man of great dexterity and cunning; yet he never had any respect for him. But for Cranmer, though the king knew that in many things he differed from him, yet, for all his being so impatient of contradiction, he always revered him. And he He was soon looked on as a rising churchman, and the teemed8by rather, because the cardinal was now declining; for in the Jrw s1 Allowing Michaelmas term the king sent for the great seal, The cardi-which the cardinal at first was not willing to part with. But nals fell. e nex y e king wrote to him, and he presently delivered it to the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk. It was offered back again to Warham, archbishop of Canterbury; but he, being very old, and foreseeing great diff1culties in the keeping of it, excused himself. So it was given to sir Thomas More, who was not only eminent in his own profession, but in all other learning: and was much esteemed for the strictness of his life, and his contempt of money. He was also the more f...
