

Ireland: Yesterday and Today (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Ireland: Yesterday and Today
The Irish people owe much to America - more, perhaps, than to any other nation in existence. The friendship between the two countries has been of long standing. The Irish exiles, driven forth by the exactions of landlordism in the early years of the eighteenth century, powerfully contributed to the victory of Washington and to the establishment of the republic on a basis of strength and security. The idea of the Irish Volunteers, who won Grattans Parliament, came from America. In the dark and evil days of 98, and during the post-Union struggles, down to the time of the Great Famine, Ireland could always command a large and generous sympathy in America. Whilst the British government refused to recognize the extent of the Famine, which was the direct consequence of British misrule, the American government forwarded shiploads of food and clothing for our starving people. When the Great Clearances swept millions of our race from the homes of their fathers and doomed them to emigration beyond the seas, America gave them a welcome with open arms. The leaders of the Young Ireland movement and of the Fenian movement found hospitality and help in America. And, when Parnell appeared upon the scene, it was America that hailed him as the deliverer of his country and gave the greatest impetus to his success. Since then the sympathy and support of America for Ireland have been never-failing. When I refer to America in this connection, I do not mean merely Irish-America, from which Ireland naturally expects support, both sentimental and material. About the Publisher
